I will see you when the sun rise is an artistic manifesto for the public space.
The publication consists of twenty statements referring to how to act and react during times of injustice and tyranny.

Beginning with I will, each statement is presented as a personalized promise and commitment to the self and to society at large. The statements also question how to protect life, society and democratic foundations from an individual and subjective point of view.

Playing with the relationship between the “I” as a messenger and “you” as receiver, the spectator embodies the content of the “I will”, and thereby is invited to take an intellectual and emotional position through its contents.

Mimicking an authoritarian aesthetic, the project seeks to politicize the public sphere through a personal covenant that is political yet poetic, and sometimes utopian at its best – and worst.

The project consists of public flags, a video and a publication.

The project is inspired by historian Timothy Snyder’s publication On Tyranny: Twenty Lessons from the Twentieth Century.

Siri Hermansen

Siri Hermansen (b. 1969) is a Norwegian filmmaker, photographer and installation artist. Through her artistic practice she investigates unforeseen affects in societies that are undergoing deep economic, environmental or cultural changes. Her work offers unusual micro-perspectives on contemporary methods of survival and processes of adaptation from societies that can be considered as uncertain zones. Hermansen's practice is located at the intersection between visual art and documentary. Her projects often deal with contemporary historical events in relation to capitalism, with democratic, legal and psychological questions, and how the past affects today's society. Her projects all share the same methodical approach, where she delves into local situations and complex cases, with individual people at the center of global processes and consequences of a world in change.

With the dissertation The Economy of Survival Siri Hermansen completed her doctorate in artistic research at The National Academy of the Arts in Oslo in 2016. Hermansen holds an MFA from Ecole de Beaux-Arts in Paris (1997) and a BFA from Parsons School of Design, New York (1997). Siri Hermansen has exhibited widely nationally and internationally. Her work has been acquired to The National Museum of Contemporary Art, North Norwegian Art Museum, Arts Council Norway, and private collections in Norway, Sweden, Germany, France and the Netherlands.

Claudia C. Sandor

Claudia C. Sandor (b. 1972) is a Norwegian-Canadian graphic designer and art director, and an art historian holding a Cand. Philol. degree from the University of Oslo and La Sapienza, Rome (2000). She wrote her thesis on Italian architecture as propaganda during Fascist rule in the 1930s and 40s, focusing on exhibition architecture by Mario De Renzi and Adalberto Libera.

In her graphic design practice Claudia C. Sandor has concentrated on design for the art world and with magazine design, winning national and international awards, most recently Award of Excellence at SND / Society for News Design for her work at the leading Norwegian lifestyle magazine D2 (2021). She currently runs her design practice in Oslo, contributing to national newspapers and magazines while developing typographical projects and studying type in motion.
